

The Big Short is a biographical drama-comedy real-life-based movie inspired by the book "The Big Short: Inside the Doomsday Machine", which represents the financial crisis in 2008. According to the facts represented in the film, the financial crisis was triggered by the United States Housing Bubble. Which was analyzed and predicted years before the happening by Michael Burry, founder of Scion Capital. The movie is depicted amazingly by adding witty methods of the portrayal of the story, like the characters explaining some terminology and distinguishing the facts that actually happened with respect to what was molded in the movie.

The movie begins by throwing light upon the professionals who got to know about the crash years before its happening. The first person to predict the crash was Michael Burry who is also depicted as the first character in the movie at 0:05:00. Then in a sequential order the three groups are introduced and focused in the movie plot with their actions. At 00:40:07 Jamie Shipley establishes an involvement with the audience when he distinguishes the fact from depiction in the movie. The movie represents a great blend of feelings of greed, humour, distress, devotion and self-absorption, and it is highlighted quite a number of times which creates a genuineness in the plot, making it more engaging, the only factor which might effect the engagement, the terminology was also taken care of in an impressive way. One of the crazy ideas represented in the movie was in the scene at 01:09:00, when the prediction doesn't get matched with reality, and the chaos created by this was portrayed phenomenally. At 01:20:00, there was a value which was put and could be learned; to never under estimate ourselves, when the big firms and even the person who predicted the crisis couldn't figure out a brilliant opportunity was discovered by Charlie Geller, right after that another message the author might be trying to convey to the audience or the consequences created to learn from it was that when there was a side where some people are benefitting massively in Billions, there will be people who'll die from poverty, there will be people losing jobs and conditions will worsen, Ben Rickert points the other point of view of the happening and asks Charlie and Jamie to not celebrate, similarly Mark Baum's point of view was changed when he realised the outcome of their prediction and from which situation they'll be profiting. There was a feeling of remorse even when their prediction gets true and they had actually profited.

I believe the film was a great initiative and was created keeping in minds of all backgrounds of people not just the business background related, and successfully managed to put on impact on people's thought process and point of view about business, finance and investments.
